fine afternoon strolling leisurely up the Avenue, his silk hat pulled over his eyes and his hands thrust into his pockets. He is a great pedestrian, but you will sometimes see him on horseback, then again in a hired back and quite frequently in the street cars. The Secretary is one of the most approachable of men; he seems to be acquainted with everybody, and if you walk up the Avenue behind him you will notice that about every other man he passes will speak

But for the last few months the well left his apartments in the big uptown hotel; his daughter had come home from school diplomat of the Confederacy, are presentative in Congress in 1873 and a senator in has married and made a home, and the in 1877, until he entered or. Cleveland's scattered family were reunited. The house of Mr Lamar is on N street, one of the quietest localities in the capital. It is just on the edge of the most fashionable section and is within easy visiting Cabinet and scores of senators and mem-bers. Just across the street is the ancient looking residence of General Meigs; around the corner 's Secretary Bayard; a little further to the west is the residence of Secretary Manning, and facing has recently been told by the press all Thomas circle live any number of distinguished men. The Lamar mansion, as I have said, is on N street, and N street is a very quiet locality. In the city of magn ficent distances we call the street a narrow one, The father of Mrs. Lamar was James and left at 6 this evening for the Golden and inviting, and inside it is especially The building was until a short time ago a plain, old-fashioned residence, with dingy brick front like the one adjoining it, and great, square win-dows with cumbersome green blinds. But it has been thoroughly renovated outside and in, and it is now as cosy a modern residence as there is on the street. It is two stories high besides the attic and basement, with high steps leading into the hall, and a fine bay window on the left, running the full length of the house and terminating at the roof in a small ornamental tower, which did much to modernize the house. The sloping roof is covered with French tiles painted red, as is also partly the bay window and

Entering the front door, passing through the vestibule, and turning to the left, you pull back the rich portiere, and Turner & McClurets. go into the reception room and pariors. The rooms are handsomely, though not ostentatiously furnished and the ornaments are both interesting and elegant. There are hundreds of houses in Washington more beautifully furnished, but few are in better taste, and fewer still have its air of elegant comfort and refinement. Bright water colors, pictures in black and white and a few paintings, many of them the work of Mrs Lamar, Jr., hang on the walls. All about are scattered the thousand and one little things, that can be made at home by the ladies, and no doubt every little ornament and bit of canvass has its little history, for very few of them have ever seen the inside of a factory. In the rear of the parlors is Secretary Lamar's library, if so it might be called. It is the room of a student; a man who is not only a student of current affairs, but a classical scholar and poet

There are books on the shelves which the Secretary studied when he was a boy at school; books of reference used when he was editor of the Southern Review in ante-bellum days; a volume of Homer that was carried in his pocket during the war: the little library he collected ween he was a professor at Oxford University, he was a professor at Oxford Chiversity, and innumerable volumes bought from time to time as he needed them. companion, but up to this time he has not entertained much, although he appears frequently in society. As he is now mardistance of the other members of the ried, however, and has a home of his own, it is confidently predicted that his house in Washington will be presided over with an elegance unsurpassed in Cabinet circles. The story of the romance that led to the second marriage of the Secretary over the country, but the true version of the affair has never been printed.

Among class. the most prominent of these was a young man named Holt and Mr. Lamar. Two men were never constituted who were tisement on the eight page of this issue more unlike in their tastes and ambitions. you will find something very instructive. Holt was eager for commercial success and the management of great industrial enterprises. Lamar was a student and poet, with an ambition for a position in the literary world. Both, however, were equally energetic in their efforts to secure the hand and heart of the lovely and accomplished Miss Dean. The efforts of Mr. Holt were successful and he gained the consent of the young lady and they were married. Their lives were happy and prosperous, and the victor was successful as well as the vanquished. General Holt, at the time of his death, was at the head of a great railroad and one of the large fortune and an elegant residence over which his widow presided with the elegance and true cordiality that always distinguishes the cultured southern woman. Mrs. Lamar is some forty-eight years of age, but with her erect and graceful carriage, her bright and young looking face she would never be judged so old but for her beautiful silvery bair. Her chief charm, however, is in her elegant manners and courtly appearance. The Lamars promise to take a very preminent part in Washington society for ie remainder of the winter, now that wealth as well as official position. The courtly presence and in ellectual conversation of the Secretary, the elegance of his wife, and the artistic taste and wit of Mrs. Lamar, Jr., promise to add a needed | Wheat Opened Firm, Ruled Steady and charm to official society. Miss Jennie Lamar, the only daughter, will do her eart towards making the house one of the deasantest ones in the capital.
